

Paragraphs – the introductory/topic sentence.

When you read these sentences what do you think the rest of the paragraph will be about?

What is reflective practice?

This sounds like a straightforward question, but the answer is in fact complex.

For other practitioners, reflective practice is a bit of a chore at best and a waste of time at worst, especially during a programme of teacher training.

There is no denying that as soon as anything becomes compulsory, it can become a burden.

When travelling home on the train after teaching an evening class, I would sometimes (but by no means always) take time to think over how the class had gone.
